This was initially thought to be because of its location, requiring an appointment, on-site, and out of the way. However, it's much more complicated than that. The actual reason it is so hard to schedule a pap test is because it is not a pap test that has been performed by a medical professional. Instead, it's been performed by a pharmacist. What a pharmacist does is determine the potential of having any type of cancer in your body, including cervical cancer. A simple pap test is one in which a pharmacist can determine the likelihood of the presence of any type of cervical cancer in a woman's body. For example, if a woman is considered to be at low risk, the pharmacist can determine whether or not the condition is detected in a six month period. However, if the woman is deemed to be at moderate risk, a pharmacist can determine whether or not the condition is detected in a three month period. In addition, there is a pap test that requires a physician's appointment, called a ThinPrep pap test. This type of test takes around five minutes and looks at the cells within the cervical squama. What this can tell the pharmacist is whether or not there is any abnormal cell growth. Cervical cancer is a condition that requires a screening test every three years, along with regular monitoring of a healthy lifestyle and diet. What to do: During the first visit to a pharmacist, a patient must arrive with a recent picture of the cervix that can be taken at home and brought into the pharmacist's office to be evaluated. What a pharmacist will do is look at the picture and determine whether the cell growth is normal or abnormal. Then, depending on the results, the pharmacist will talk to the patient about what the future may hold for her. The next visit to the pharmacist will be a follow-up visit and the pharmacist can then work with the patient to determine what the next step in the process will be. If the pharmacist feels the patient's lifestyle is in need of improvement, there may be referrals to a physician or a diet 82157476af
